Mining for gold and finding treasure worth far moreVon LaylaReaderMatt Sutherland is a self-made man who has risen from poverty to a position of responsibility. He takes his 5 years of hard earned savings and heads to Arizona to mine for gold. He wants to make enough money to be considered good enough to marry the wealthy Patricia.He arrives just in time for an auction and spontaneously parts with his money for a shared claim, accepting a scrawny young woman (Deidre/Dee) as his partner.They are an unlikely match, but prove to balance each other well. Dee is hard-working, knows the terrain, cooks well and, most importantly, knows about mining. She longs for a better life and feels deeply ashamed that she can't read or write. Underneath the fancy Eastern appearance, Matt is strong,hard-working, genuine and honest.For the first time in her life, Dee is treated with respect and doesn't have to duck blows. Matt shares the earnings with her, astounding her with the first money she has ever had in her own hands. Her brother had always told her that women were incapable and proceeded to drink all the profits away in the town saloon. Matt teaches her patiently, understanding her desire for betterment, based on his own past.Matt finds himself challenging what he really wants. Dee scoffs her food and looks like a ragamuffin, but she has a huge heart, honesty and integrity. She is a true partner and not the genteel and helpless lady he always thought he wanted at his side.They face the challenges of mining and the prejudice and bigotry in town, the dangers of the wild and people trying to cheat and steal from them.Their attraction is a force of nature and develops almost against their wishes.The story is well paced with rounded characters, action and humour.I hope to see more by this author.
